UNCLASSIFIEDWORKING PAPER*II. ENUNCIATION OF NATIONAL POLICY OBJECTIVES

National security objectives (or missions) and the obstacles (or threat) posed to the attainment of those objectives (or mission accomplishment) are the principal determinants of the capability this nation must maintain to achieve its foreign policy goals. Similarly, the needed capabilities in that subset of national power, broadly known as counterintelligence, are mainly derived from the scope of missions to be accomplished, the dimensions of the foreign intelligence threat, and other interaction.

Each year, the foreign intelligence threat is elaborated and prioritized in a single authoritative document. No comparable document posits the overall objectives (missions) of the Community responsible for the closely related activities of counterintelligence operations and security countermeasures.

The solemn obligation and sovereign right of the Federal Government to protect against activities undertaken by foreign powers, which are inimical to the interests of the United States is, of course set forth in statutes. And it is specifically recognized in E.O. 12333, which states "Special emphasis should be given to detecting and countering espionage and other threats and activities directed by foreign intelligence services against the United States Government, or United States corporations, establishments, or persons."
